Reading through these keys to success makes you feel like someone who knows you very well just wrote you a letter to encourage you to go through with the program.

I used to think that classes were supposed to give you the skills and knowledge you needed. Coming from an art major, I came to understand a while ago that was not always the case. Not asking if I'm doing things right is probably the hardest one because I do that very often. I do like to have some input from time to time even if I'm trying my best. I'll try to avoid the question. Finally point 9 really felt personal, I came across this problem as soon as doing assignment 2: doing research about the terms I didn't understand was like a rabbit hole, coming across many things I didn't know about and having to understand them in order to understand some others. I was trying to understand everything and it was so dense just by reading through it all so I really hope that in this bootcamp there will be some guidance to start easy so we can understand the really complex things later.
